Monitoring Global Radiative Forcing from Space

Radiative forcing is a fundamental metric for measuring the extent to which human activities alter Earth's energy balance. This perturbation initiates all other forced changes in the climate.

This project will use satellite observations to develop tools for monitoring radiative forcing from space. This will enable a better understanding of how human activities are changing Earth’s energy balance and monitor the effectiveness of future efforts to mitigate these changes.